The subject matter disclosed herein relates to the art of turbomachines and, more particularly, to a flow lock for regulating the flow of air into a turbomachine. In gas turbine engines, air is drawn into a turbomachine through an inlet diffuser and routed through a compressor. The compressed air flows into a combustor where fuel is mixed with the air and ignited, and the mixture is then routed through a turbine. The interaction of the hot combustion gases with a turbine causes the turbine to rotate, thereby producing mechanical energy that may be used for various purposes. A portion of the air that is compressed is routed into a flow path that includes a flow lock. The flow lock is defined by an inlet portion, a diffuser portion, and an outlet portion. The inlet portion forms a boundary where the air is introduced into the flow path. The diffuser portion is defined by a diffuser blade. The diffuser portion guides the flow of the air into the flow path. The outlet portion forms a boundary where the air leaves the flow path. The diffuser portion of the flow path directs the air in a flow that is generally parallel to an axis of rotation of the turbine. The outlet portion of the flow path allows the compressed air to leave the flow path and enters a conduit to the next stage of the compressor.
